Iftar: Making Space for More of Us

By Shenaaz Janmohamed

The U.S. is home to 8 million Muslims, and Islam is a vast multiracial faith. The first Muslims in the U.S. were forcibly brought over as enslaved African Muslims, who showed great resistance, continuing their spiritual practices despite grave persecution and danger. Ramadan, the ninth month of the Muslim lunar calendar, is a time of community gathering and collective spiritual practices. A central Ramadan practice is a daily fast from sunrise to sunset, closing nightly with community coming together to share food during iftars. These iftars can be a beautiful reflection of the history of migration and resilience of Muslims through food—from tamales, collard greens, noodles, biryani and much more.

iftar spaces can also be a needed sanctuary for Muslim communities amidst oppressive conditions like Trump’s Travel Ban, ongoing occupation in Palestine, famine in Yemen, and displacement of countless peoples due to war and military intervention across many Arab states and Muslim majority countries. Muslim folks are not alone in needing sanctuary in this historical moment. People need to come together in community-created spaces that are deliberately resisting ICE and refusing to police black and brown bodies—safe(r) places that are community-built, where we can move towards healing and recalibrate our nervous systems.

For LGBTQIA Muslims however, to find community sanctuary can feel like an impossible feat. The global reach of patriarchy and its consequences of homophobia and transphobia continues to affict our religious and spiritual communities. And the disconnection from spiritual and faith practices within social justice community does not invite Muslim folks to show up as whole to our organizing work. We often experience a double bind where we do not feel fully whole within Queer spaces and are often unwelcome or closeting ourselves in straight Muslim spaces.

Due to the onslaught of discrimination

Indulging Nourishment

By Mitali Purkayastha

“Caring for myself is not self-indulgence, it is self-preservation, and that is an act of political warfare.” —Audre Lorde

In the spirit of radical poet—and lesbian mom—Audre Lorde, I believe we need to decolonize acts of self-indulgence and of self-nourishment. We need to remind ourselves that food and plant medicine are ancestral ritual, critically important to self- and family-preservation and health. Many spiritual and cultural practices regard eating as ritual, as a very sacred time. Meals are where different peoples’ energies are drawn together, where thanks are given. A nourishing meal at home with family is that very ritual: it is an extremely special time, when eyes and heart can connect, when the self and the family is fueled.

Breaking bread in family settings has great benefits, whether you’re a single parent juggling things, or you feel disconnected from your family or culture of origin, or your family consists of adults working around the clock at home. Defrosting, prepping, and organizing meals on a regular basis might feel daunting. It’s hard at any time to juggle work life and community engagement and healthy food prep for your family. But now many of us feel like we are just fighting to survive. That means that now it is even more important to value self-preservation, re-imagining what indulgence means.

You might feel indulgence is shameful. You might even think it refers only to “treats.” But why does making and sharing a meal feel like a chore more than a practice of self-care? Relax a moment and imagine the meals you most looked forward to growing up. A grandmother’s dish, your aunt’s rich cooking flavors, went to Catholic Mass with my siblings and mamá every Sunday when I was growing up. I remember eagerly awaiting the time the priest would lift up the host, bless it, and share it with the community—mimicking Christ’s fractio panis—the practice of breaking the sacramental bread. It turns out every spiritual tradition has a similar practice that revolves around shared nourishment of our individual and collective minds, bodies, and souls. The preparation and sharing of meals can be global rituals, unequivocally tied to love and care, in addition to survival. Preparing meals in community, with loved ones or strangers, is a great opportunity for us to connect to each other’s humanity and Earth’s bounty. The sharing of meals allows us to build community and nourish ourselves and those we love, even when we’re chasing our toddlers around the table or begging our kiddos to ingest at least one spoonful of veggies. Yes, some meals can be quite stressful and preparation even harder—considering most of us are juggling a thousand responsibilities. And yet, they are still invitations for us to nourish ourselves, express gratitude for the nourishment, and connect with each other.

What we eat is one of the most important decisions we make every day (when we, in fact, have the privilege of making that decision). Our food and environments can either promote our family’s health or make us sick. History has also taught us that our food has been colonized and weaponized against us over and over again. The way our food is produced and prepared can contribute to healthy communities, or it can undermine them. Our farming practices can use scarce natural resources responsibly, or they can deplete them. What we produce and consume tells stories of our access, privilege, and cultures. Inevitably, then, our food consumption—specifically—must become a major site of resistance and cultural reclamation. Our consumption has the power to link us back to the spiritual “breaking of the bread” and nourishing of our families in a very different way than what’s usually dictated by commercial interests.

In this newsletter issue, we explore the shared wisdom of Shenaaz Janmohamed and Mitali Purkayastha and their recipes for resistance. And in this short column, I invite you to also consider how many revolutions were birthed at the kitchen table and how we can best continue feeding the bodies and souls of our movements for LGBTQ equity. We know LGBT folks experience disproportionate levels of food insecurity and higher participation rates in the SNAP program, for instance, especially those of us raising children and in black and brown communities. In fact, data from the Williams Institute at UCLA suggests that same-sex couples raising children are approximately twice as likely to receive food stamps as different-sex couples with children. It is, then, our collective responsibility to bring food politics to the center of our social justice agenda and continue fueling this work in sustainable ways.

What does that mean? We must nourish the body, mind, and souls of our various communities, which includes ensuring that our agents of change and children can access healthy food, rest, and connection to each other. We have known and done this since the beginning of time: Our revolution can start right in our very own kitchens selecting what is yummy for our families’ health and teaching ourselves to critically assess our food origins and choices (or lack of choices). We can model for our children what communing over meals could look like without a cell phone at hand. We can support a more responsible and sustainable food system. And, yes, we must continue to demand that our political leaders step up to the plate. This summer, we invite you to keep cultivating and feeding your family and friends with relationships and food that will help us grow and propel social justice forward. Break bread with us?
What a night! Thanks to all who made our Night Out gala an unprecedented success. Hundreds of community leaders, sponsors, and donors came together to honor leadership, celebrate, and give very generously to help ensure we can sustain and expand our critical work.

Consider now preparing that favorite comforting meal as if its preparation were a ritual. As you grow in your practice of that ritual, try to give it the time and the space it needs. Build space in your schedule (even if it’s once a month at first). Over time you will the ingredients—and the intention—will grow. And with that, so will the nutrition.

As the ritual of preparing and sharing meals becomes a more established part of your life, inevitable changes will create variations in how you make meals. How much time do you have on any given day? What’s in the fridge? Perhaps you couldn’t make it to the store this week: what dried and bulk foods do you have? Being mindful also means being resourceful. Remember that our/your ancestors ate whole foods. How can you incorporate whole grains, seeds, the whole vegetable (root, fruit, and stem) into this meal? If sitting together at the table isn’t an option for your family for any reason, still make the preparation of the food a ritual for you and your family. Include everyone you can. Anything from packing lunches, to adding an ingredient to the pot, to brainstorming a grocery list of favorite foods, can be a way that everyone, of every age, can be involved in this sacred process of nourishment!

Your self- and family-nourishing ritual will be more powerful when all the food, herbs, spices, and other remedies are sourced and made by sustainable growers and makers. Indulging in teas, salves, oils, rubs, and any other accessible herbal and spice remedies for the entire family is another radical act of self-love and sustainable nourishment. Incorporate these plant-based remedies into your morning or nightly rituals, as a way to indulge in another moment of self-preservation. As a way to signal storytime and bedtime with your children, light a candle, dim the lights, and apply a relaxing lavender salve. This is a gentle way to show yourself and your children some love before bed. With any and every seemingly busy, necessary family care step, set an intention, help yourself see that act as ritual, as your love alive in practice.

Connecting with the earth and their medicines, plants, and foods is connecting you and your family to your roots. Nourishing yourselves, your families, your loved ones, your roots, and your whole being: what a sweet, indulgent, radical act of love.

Iftar...

and violence against Muslim folks in the U.S., our communities often spend their time facing externally-fighting back against Islamophobia, resisting harmful policies, and organizing to build power and voice. Less time is available to look inward and consider questions around who has access, safety, and inclusion within our Muslim community. Staying curious and open to how marginalized folks experience systemic oppression due to disability, gender, sexuality, class and race, are questions all communities must grapple with to meet the changing political and cultural expressions and needs of this historical time.

There is a collective need for community to experience spaces that are affirming in our wholeness and that assert an experience of belonging. As an organizer and healer—but mostly because of my role as a mama—I have felt this need for LBTQIA Muslims to be held in all of our intersecting identities. I have been longing for my 2.5-year-old daughter to witness the rich and deep spiritual practices within Islam, while also knowing she and her queer family are fully welcomed and held as part of the greater whole. This past Ramadan I birthed Queer Crescent Healing, a community project that creates healing arts and spiritual practice spaces for queer, trans and nonbinary Muslims. We kicked off our programing by hosting a weekly healing iftar for queer and trans Muslims and allies. During these iftars we invited healers from adjacent and allied communities to share their modalities and practices such as herbalists, body workers, reiki/energy workers, organizers, and martial arts practitioners.

Looking back at this month of celebrating both Ramadan and Pride, I feel humbled knowing I was able to tap into the legacy of resistance, which is the foundational lesson from our Stonewall ancestors. I am reminded that sometimes the most revolutionary acts are the subtle ways we interrupt the status quo, and instead decide to radically make space for more of us to be seen. Making space for more of us to heal and be free.

Shenaaz Janmohamed, LCSW is the Founding Director of Queer Crescent Healing, a healing arts and justice organization building safety and spiritual practice spaces for trans, queer and gender nonconforming Muslims.
